SABOTEURS V. SEAL HUNTERS

THE WATERS of the Wash, so recently threatened by a huge oil slick, have seen yet another dark stain drifting across the waters. But this time there was no panic, no questions in Parliament, no clean-up squad. For the slick was blood. And it was spilt with the sanction of the law in a clinical, deadly but perfectly legal game. The name of the game – Seal Cull.

The rules are simple. Seals eat 5lb. of fish a day, therefore seals have to be killed off. Players need an official licence to start, and score about £10 a time with every well-aimed shot from their .22 rifles.

After following and sabotaging the hunters for ten days members of HSA Midland & East Anglia group are in a position to know the results of the slaughter for the official view was a long way from the brutal truth. The following quote is from a hardened newspaper reporter who thought nothing in this country could ever shock him, and who had this to say on July 11th.

"In a shrimp boat we shadowed the hunters' trawler Mispah to the sprawling sandbanks of the Lincolnshire coast where the killing began at 6.45 am. I was glad that I had risen too early for breakfast.

"A red speed boat left the Mispah and took two marksmen to the sands. The older seals instinctively ushered the pups towards the water and for a minute they stayed submerged. But seals, being mammals, cannot stay submerged for too long and soon a tiny head surfaced for air. Five shots later the first cub to die in the cull was just a bloody carcase to be dropped into the speedboat K870.

"More killing followed as the speed-boats sped from sandbank to sandbank. Speed is essential and the hunters have just fourteen days to kill an oddly arbitrary 380 seals.

"Each speed boat's catch was brought to the Mispah, where a hunter worked on the deck with a long curved knife. First he removed the entrails from the still warm, bloody body. Then he slipped the carcase into a plastic bag for future sale to a cat food company. Finally the pelts were towed on a rope behind the boat to clean them. Blood ran down the decks of the Mispah in rivulets until they too added to the growing stain in the dark waters of the Wash."

Saboteurs too saw these sights: saboteurs from London, from East Anglia and the Midlands. Teams of them worked in the dangerous waters of the Wash, trying to move the seals beyond the gun-boats' range, but the frail canoes sank in four foot waves. TV, radio and the press reported the unequal battle. Three land strikes on the hunters' camp caused the hunters to call for police protection, and although the hunters themselves threatened saboteurs with their guns, the relentless pressure was kept on the hunters. Every move was watched and faithfully reported to the press; this of course only increased the hunters' vigilance. One bright, moonlit night soon after the start of the cull, a support team for a frogman saboteur lay watching the leader of the hunters as he came within four feet of them with his gun. No one moved, and the huntsman turned away without seeing them. The forgman lay on the mud under the bows of the trawler and only the strong current stopped him from completing his task. He had rolled in the mud to camouflage himself only seconds before a hunter shone his torch over him as he checked his boat.

After an age of waiting, the saboteur had to withdraw, unable to complete his task, scrambling up the steep bank as the tide raced out.

Night after night the saboteurs kept the pressure on. The huntsmen, now bleary-eyed and haggard from lack of sleep, capitulated after ten days, 47 seals short of their target.

Only lack of funds prevented the total success of the saboteurs' work; all they needed was a fast boat to get their diver out. You can prevent this senseless slaughter of seals next year by helping us buy a boat. We need to raise £600. Don't let the seals down. Send whatever you can to Rorke Garfield, 65 Lower Thrist Street, Northampton.

Hi there!

Welcome to the first edition of the Hunt Saboteurs Association magazine.

We hope that this will go some way towards bridging the communications gap amongst our own members and also outline some of our activities to our many supporters.

HOWL is essentially a newsletter, wherein we can compile all those interesting snippets from local papers that you send in.

It's also a viewsletter, not grinding it's own axe, but a platform where all those concerned with animal welfare can air their opinions on different aspects. So please let us have lots of articles, cuttings, cartoons or letters. We want to make No. 2 even better.

Good anti-huntin'.

Rorke Hospitalised

Rorke Garfield, East Anglia H.S.A. organiser has gone into hospital for the fourth time for an operation on his wrist, after he was whipped by Nally of the Oakley Hunt last October. He has spent £150 in legal costs, trying to sue Nally for compensation. He has received £65 from an appeal in the last newsletter.

He is also trying to raise funds for a landrover, a boat, and a diving suit, for next year's seal cull on the Wash. Amongst his schemes to raise funds locally was a sponsored cannon tow!

Rorke is desperately short of money, having also spent £122 on sabotage materials recently. Any donations would be like manna from heaven. Please send whatever you can spare direct to Rorke at 65 Lower Thrift Street, Northampton.

FACT

23 otters were killed in Britain in 1971 (16 of these were in Scotland and Wales). Eastern Counties have killed one this year, Border Counties have murdered four.

"You know what to do, lads—they're much too overcrowded"

HUNTS A PEST?

Hounds of the Derwent Hunt (Co. Durham) which worried five pregnant ewes and killed four, cost the master, Mr. Charles Chafer a £10 fine and £80 compensation in July this year. The hunt had been allowed to hunt on Forestry Commission land (!) but had attacked the sheep belonging to an adjacent farm.

BOVVER BOYS ACTIVE

According to the London "Evening News" (13.4.73), "members of the Tickham Hunt (Kent) are arming themselves with coshes and spanners to ward off antis." Naturally, police action will be swift, and we can all expect immediate arrests for carrying offensive weapons . . . Well, don't hold your breath.

Ritual Slaughter in Britain

JEWISH AND MOSLEM ritual slaughter of meat animals continues to be practised in modern-day Britain – a standing disgrace to this so-called "nation of animal lovers".

Kosher and Hallal slaughter are both steeped in superstitious hocus-pocus and involve intense cruelty to the animal. According to the Talmud, the Jews' law book, the slaughter must be carried out by a "schochet" (a sort of lay rabbi). The schochet with his assistants parades to the killing holding their knives in front of them and muttering ritual Hebrew phrases. The killing room must be Kosher, and not "polluted" by Christian slaughter.

The animal to be slaughtered is shackled with irons around one of its rear legs, although in some countries it is encased in an iron-lung-type cast. It is then hoisted off the ground until its head is at shoulder height. The shochet then jabs two fingers into the unfortunate animal's eye socket, gouging out its eye-ball. He then slashes fiercely at the animal's throat. It takes cattle from 30 to 60 seconds to lose consciousness, and up to 15 minutes to bleed to death. Sheep can take half an hour. All the time the attendants mutter Hebrew incantations.

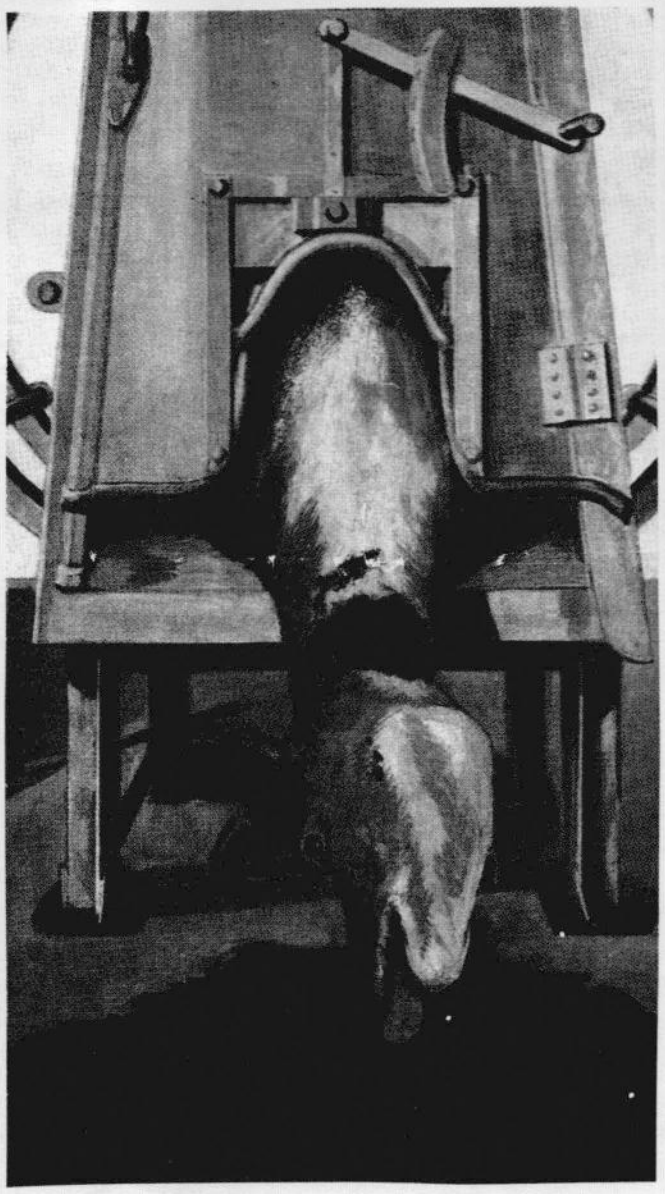

Animal lovers who object to this hideous practice are requested to register their feelings with the local Jewish and Moslem communities; or why not picket a Kosher Butcher, and point out to customers the origin of their "pound of flesh".

The grisly result of casting (below)

No stunning or anaesthetic is used: the animal must bleed to death to be properly Kosher.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Dear Sir/Madam,

The activities of your bunch of layabouts and hippies has recently come to my attention. It is absolutely outrageous that hooligans should be permitted to run amok in the country-side, breaking down fences and disrupting the peaceful rural calm. What is even more preposterous is that you blackguards receive £5 a week, I believe, from the Russian Embassy for your services. At least fox-hunting folk pay for their simple pleasures.

Yours etc.

THE CASE FOR FOXHUNTING

Why I became a Vegetarian

FOR THOSE who eat the flesh of animals, it may seem odd that anyone should cease to do so, indeed, those who do not are often regarded as food fadists, cranks or the like. However, in order to give some indication of what "turns us off", I would like to tell of what initiated my eventual refusal to accept the mutilated bodies of animals as part of my diet.

It happened during my evacuation to the country with my parents, following one of the particularly heavy bombing spells of the 1939–45 war.

One fine morning, I was sent on an errand to a butcher's shop in the next village.

A small queue of village ladies, and what seemed endless chit-chat between the butcher and whoever was being served, contrived to make my errand much longer than I had expected. I was about to draw faces in the sawdust which covered the floor, when the air was disturbed by the sound of shouting and the crack of sticks hitting the road outside. I peered through the open door, there stood a brown cow, her soft eyes seemed to reflect the fear she obviously felt. Several men and youths were making great efforts to drive her up the cobbed lane, but she stood her ground, swinging her head from side to side in what seemed an attempt to find a way of escape. Some village boys joined in to help and, with more frantic shouting plus the sound of sticks hitting her hind quarters, the terrified animal stumbled reluctantly forward. Two more men appeared from the rear of the building, both wearing white blood splattered jackets and trousers, white close fitting round hats and rubber boots. With arms outstretched, and one holding a noosed rope, they headed the luckless cow into one of the rooms at the rear of the shop building.

My turn in the queue had now come, but I could still hear the men shouting, "hold still . . . over . . . come ere". It was almost as though they were saying "come on . . . it's nice to die", and even seemed angry that she had no wish to do so! After paying the butcher for my mother's order, I slipped out of the shop and along the cobbled lane to the entrance of the room where the cow had been driven.

The village boys had gone, but I could see one of the drovers and a white clad man, pulling on a rope which had been passed through a metal ring in the floor. The cow was on her knees, hind legs straining apart and her head pulled down by the noose. The other white clad man seemed to be fiddling with something, it was difficult to see just what it was as he turned away from the door, but I guessed that it was some sort of gun. I shall never forget the look in the eye of that pathetic animal, or the utter despair I felt for her, but at that moment I could stand no more . . . I turned and ran in horror from that place.

It occurred to me that it was never considered as to whether animals wanted to die or not. A cat or dog, presumably by virtue of its domesticated closeness to man, will, more often than not, have every need catered for. But a sheep, cow, lamb or calf, though none the less lovable and often more docile, will sooner or later be executed in order to satisfy the traditional tastes of humanity. Such is the paradoxical nature of mankind.

Not long after the end of the war, at the age of about fifteen, I decided to become a Vegetarian. Friends thought I had gone completely mad, workmates poked fun at what they called a "nuts and berries diet", but my parents, who I'm sure had grave doubts as to the effect on my well being, did not discourage my new way of life at all.

For me, Vegetarianism provides a healthy, humane and ethically more acceptable way of life and, since the act of eating takes place at least three times a day, we are, by example a reminder to those with whom we come into contact, and it is hoped, a stimulus for reasoned thought processes which will ultimately lead to a more harmonious existence between man and the creatures with whom we are privileged to share this planet.

I think it can safely be assumed that my keen interest in H.S.A. activities, is a positive extension of vegetarian principles which are opposed to cruelty and injustice. It is true that there are certain aspects of Nature which are cruel, but I do not see this as a valid reason for deliberately enhancing the savage instincts of one species, merely to keep down the numbers of another, least of all in the name of ritualistic sports such as hunting.

For as long as I can remember, the awareness of 'Life' has been a constant companion, though its fragile briefness has seemed to mock the very existence of beings privileged to glimpse but only a few precious weeks of their potential lifespan, due mainly to the selfish unthinking indifference of Man.

Why I'm a Vegan

IN ARGUMENTS with hunting types you've probably been confronted with the question, "Do you eat meat?" In a way this question isn't relevant because the fact that an anti may eat meat doesn't mean that hunting isn't cruel. However I do think it's important that we make sure that no cruelty arises because of our own lifestyles, and that's why I'm a Vegan.

Veganism is the practice of living on the products of the plant kingdom to the exclusion of all food and other commodities derived from animals. Many people are vegetarians because they feel that to slaughter animals for food is a violation of the principle of 'reverence for life' as well as being cruel. But why give up such things as milk and eggs? Here are some of the reasons:–

Milk production is wrong because it involves the repeated imposition of pregnancy upon the cow, the separation of the cow and her new born calf, the slaughter of all worn-out older cows, and the slaughter at birth, or after a short period (often spent in a factory farm) of all the unwanted bull calves.

Egg production involves unnatural feeding to produce heavy layers, perverse methods of laying simulation (the battery system etc.) and the slaughter of old hens and unwanted cocks.

I for one hope that the end of the bloodsportsman's reign of terror, when it finally comes, will be swiftly followed by the downfall of butchers and slaughtermen. Turn Vegan and help bring that happy day a little nearer.

Full details from the Vegan Society.

Why I'm Omniverous

ALTHOUGH it is true that most people eat meat just because it is the 'normal' thing to do, there are also many people who are omniverous only after having given the subject much thought, and subjecting themselves to a rigorous self-examination. I would like to think that I am one of the latter variety.

I believe that all human omnivores should themselves be prepared to administer death and carry out the butchery of the animals they consume and wear. I have myself worked in an abattoir, and although the place was far from modern, all the animals were dealt with in a humane way. Unfortunately, although the animals could not see the butchering pens, they could smell and sense what was going on. However, this particular abattoir has now been replaced by an ultra modern, more hygienic and humane establishment.

I believe humans are justified in eating our fellow creatures because I am essentially a realist. Human beings have the schizoid predicament of being part human, part animal, and it would be folly to try and pretend otherwise. We have a digestive system which is constructed to cope with all types of food. We have canine teeth to aid us in tearing flesh. In short, it is natural that we should eat meat. And it is out of my own deep respect for nature that I acknowledge the realities of nature's life cycles. If humans stopped eating meat all over the world, disaster would quickly ensue. There is just not enough earth to grow crops to feed everybody. There would be an uncontrollable boom in the population of farm animals. One has only to look at the Hindu areas of India to see a small part of what it would be like. Rats are allowed to consume millions of tons of grain every year, because no one dares to kill them.

To my mind, no one can avoid killing to survive. We all kill countless numbers of bacteria every minute we breathe. We tramp on thousands of minute creatures wherever we walk. And we must also kill larger creatures to maintain our carbon/nitrogen life system.

Many people, of course, confuse various arguments in different fields of animal welfare. We all know the huntsman's 'intellectual' argument that all antis must necessarily be vegetarian. But agreeing with the killing of animals to eat, is not the same as supporting the killing of them for fun. And because you are an omnivore does not mean that you agree with factory farming. However, I hope this article has gone some way towards clarifying one argument at least.

NEWCASTLE ACTIVITIES

Friends of the Earth have laid on the following events in the North East, as a "Weekend for Wildlife". 2nd November 1973: 'Films for Wildlife' – Tyneside Film Theatre, Pilgrim Street, Newcastle.
3rd November 1973 aft. 'March for Wildlife'. Gateshead to Newcastle. Evening: More films.
4th November 1973: 'Music for Wildlife', Odeon Cinema, Pilgrim Street, Newcastle.

PHEASANT FARMERS FOXED

A Norfolk pheasant breeding farm lost 11,000 birds in mysterious circumstances last March when someone released the birds in the middle of the night. Baffled local police are still looking for the poachers who are believed to have carried out the raid.

ROYAL STAMP

Two new stamps are to be issued in November to celebrate the Royal wedding. As it may be illegal to publish such a recommendation, we would not, repeat NOT like to suggest that antis use the stamps upside down, to protest against the bride and groom's foxhunting fetish.

SQUIRREL POISONING

Poison is being laid for squirrels in Lincolnshire woods. If you find one before it's too late, the antidote for "Prodein" poison is "Vitamin K" – from any friendly vet.

SUCCESS IN MID-WALES

It looks like otter hunters will be banned from a long stretch of the River Rhiew in Montgomeryshire. Local H.S.A. organiser, Malcolm Douglass has had a favourable response to representations made to Col. J. L. Corbett-Winder, the local landowner, Lord Lieutenant and president of the local branch of the Council for the Protection of Rural Wales.

INTERCOURSE WITH HUNT

Dundee antis visited a local hunt's point-to-point this season and wangled free tea and cakes from the Hunt Supporters Club. Branch funds were also supplemented by some profitable betting. A member of Bourne group who runs a disco has been booked for a Fitzwilliam Hunt party! There are also discos run by members at Nottingham and at Bury St. Edmunds. Anyone wishing to book them should contact H.Q.

Hunts routed at horse shows

South-East London Hunt Saboteurs successfully campaigned for the cancellation of a parade of West Kent fox-hounds at Greenwich Horse Show in September. After a scathing letter to the local paper, Labour controlled Greenwich Council agreed to call off the parade, although no threat had been made to disrupt the show. Afterwards, committee member Dave McCalden appeared in a 20 minute interview on the local Greenwich Cablevision T.V. station. Letters from West Kent supporters, seething with rage about the cancellation, later appeared in the local press, and although they were cordially invited to a discussion with Saboteurs, the hunt supporters declined.

Sour grapes were also in evidence after a similar campaign about the G.L.C. Horse Show at Clapham Common. Councillor David White successfully made representations on behalf of the H.S.A. to have a similar parade of fox-hounds thwarted. The entire editorial of September's "Light Horse" was devoted to griping about the affair. Reverberations continued with several subsequent mentions in the London "Evening Standard".

Earlier in the year, saboteurs invaded the arena of the Royal Windsor Horse Show when a parade of otter hounds appeared. Sabs waved banners in front of the Royal Box, much to the distress of the Duke of Edinburgh, who despite his World Wildlife Fund connections, is a dedicated deer shooter.

Saboteurs also picketed the BFSS fair at Shotover Park, Oxford. They distributed leaflets to visitors urging them not to patronise this bloodsports promotion. Although there was little response some good publicity appeared in the local press.

ABOUT TIME

The Badgers' Bill, which prohibits the killing or injuring of badgers for sport, was passed by the House of Commons on July 4th, 1973. The Bill still allows badgers to be killed by farmers in certain circumstances.

CONSERVANCY?

The Wiltshire Trust for Nature Conservancy has come up with an unusual scheme for raising money. It is offering people the chance to take part in a bird shoot! The Trust will auction off the rights for a two-day shoot in Clarendon Park, Amesbury, for seven guns.

NEW SABOTAGE TACTICS

Shooting has been banned from the Aldridge Woods, Staffs., for fear of courting couples being shot.

HSA RIP-OFFS

"Hounds off . . " badges – 5p plus stamp
"Hounds off . ." T shirts – £1.50
Stickers – details on request, all from Headquarters.

WORRYING HAS HUNT WORRIED

Farmers have banned the South Telcott Hunt from 3000 acres of land after losing six lambs, due to hounds chasing ewes. The Cattesmore (Lincs) will shortly be losing 5000 acres of prime hunting land when the Erpingham reservoir is flooded.

HEADS WE WIN . . .

A police sergeant threatened to arrest some saboteurs for "conduct liable to cause a breach of the peace". When asked to clarify what exactly he meant, he replied that it would be "conduct liable to cause a breach of the peace" if they caused a huntsman to assault them.

SABOTAGE HINT

If you have to "spend a penny" when out on a strike, why not do it in a useful place – like right in the path of a pack of hounds. A "quick spray round" can delay even the most dedicated fox-hound.

SABOTAGE HINT

Try frequently spraying the soles and heels of your shoes with anti-mate when out on a hunt. This leaves a very convincing false trail.

BUCKS SPLIT

It appears that the Bucks & Courtnay Tracey Otter Hunt are ceasing their amalgamation this year. The Bucks will become a hunt club, with no dogs of their own, but will occasionally invite other packs to hunt "their" country. The Courtnay Tracey will take over the present pack, and operate solely out of their Wilton kennels. Although the two packs amalgamated in the mid 60's, most of the hunts have taken place in CTOH country. Now that the Bucks have split, the CTOH will have to find an extra £1500 p.a. to cover running costs. The hunt may well run into financial difficulties; their hound van recently failed it MOT, and a Hertz van had to be used. Also they must be turning away genuine sympathisers, since for some reason (!) the secretary will not give meet venues over the phone.
P.S. Bourne group send cordial greetings to Geoffrey Hall, the whipper-in, who was decent enough to get drunk with them this summer.

The Bucks' latest style in hound vans – their own failed its MOT

NATIONAL FRONT OPPOSES BLOODSPORTS

The 1973 A.G.M. of the National Front, Britain's fourth largest political party, passed a motion condemning bloodsports and ritual slaughter, proposed by NF and HSA member Dave McCalden. Other antis who are also active in political groups are encouraged to put forward similar motions, so that the attack on bloodsports is from all directions.

BROMLEY KNOCKS HUNT ARGUMENT FOR SIX

Up until now, one of the fox hunters' favourite defences of his barbaric pastime has been that fox-hunting is the most humane and efficient method of controlling the fox. They have continually maintained that shooting foxes is impossible However, it appears that they will have to think up a new excuse, as the London Borough of Bromley has shown that it can be done. Their pest control department receives about 700 complaints a year about foxes, most of them of the "There's-a-fox-in-my-garden" variety. However, they do act on the serious complaints and last year dispatched 300 foxes. These complaints ranged from foxes killing pet rabbits to sniffing round babies in prams. The deputy pest controller, Mr. Weedy, refused to allow an H.S.A. representative to accompany their marksman, claiming that they had had too much publicity already. However, he did claim that their marksman, an ex-gamekeeper, was a crack shot with a 12 bore. Many of the foxes killed are baldy with mange, he revealed. Although foxes above ground are shot, if they go to earth they have to be gassed with cyanide gas. Mr. Weedy does however maintain that both methods are quite humane.

Local naturalists are however unconvinced that foxes are in fact a pest, but at least the case has shown the falseness of yet another of the hunt's theories.

BATH BEFUZZED

Bath Group report a lot of recent harassment from the local fuzz. Antis were questioned when it was reported that artificial fox-dens on the Duke of Beaufort's estate had been damaged. At another incident police confiscated sprays and handed them over to hunt supporters!! However, some successful hits have been recorded, including one where Mark & Anne were present. Antis also appeared on a Radio Bristol programme debating against the local hunting fraternity.
